As the elected sheriff and local alpha of Cove County, Otto Baier is a take-charge alpha with life where he wants it. He has a job he loves, a house that he loves to work on, and a community that loves him. It's smooth sailing until the day he comes home to find a window jimmied open, his kitchen raided, and a blonde thief curled up in his bed. By all rights, he should toss her in jail, but it's hardly the crime of the century. And there's just something about the way that she smells... Otto couldn't send her away if he wanted to. His inner bear wouldn't stand for it.

Goldie is running scared. She's just trying to survive the mistakes of her past. Breaking into the rundown ranch house on the edge of town is a crime of desperation, pure and simple. Staying... well, that's probably a crime of stupidity. But it might be her best piece of luck in awhile. And there's just something about the way that Otto Baier looks at her... If she could stay...

Goldie and Otto both have their secrets, but Goldie's might very well kill them. And Otto, well, he's never known when to leave well enough alone.
